

The Ford Factory

Here is a picture from where we went off the tram, on our way to the Ford factory. It was really early in the morning, and the air was very cold. We walked about one kilometer from the tram stop, to come to the Ford factory. When we got to the factory, a man came to meet us and showed us the way to the welcome hall.

In the welcome hall hot drinks were waiting for us, and we got to sit down. It was a big white screen that showed pictures and videos of the making of different Fords and factories. Our guide told that this factory only made Fiesta, but a few years ago they also made Ford Focus. Unfortunately the guided tour was in German, so we did not understand everything. But we understood that Henry Ford himself opened the factory.

When the guide was done talking, there were safety glasses by the door that we needed to use inside the factory. Outside there was a small tour train waiting for us, some of as you see on the picture was a bit cold and was looking forward to come inside the factory. There are no pictures from inside the factory as the rules was against it, but we got to see the whole proses of the making of a Ford Fiesta. From the welding of the frame, get the motor in place, and the small finishing touches. It was fun to see how a car is actually built, and a good experience. We also heard that just weeks after we were there, Ken Block was at the factory to look over the making of his new Ford Fiesta.
